Harvard Paradigm and Empirical Research into Milk and Dairy Products

Key words and phrases: competition; coordination mechanism; Harvard paradigm; milk and dairy products; sector market.

Abstract: The paper shows the results of the empirical research into milk and dairy products market in Russia and its regions, determining its peculiarities and compliance with the conditions of perfect competition. The methodological basis of the research is a “structure – conduct – performance” paradigm used in the theory of sector markets. The term “sector markets” is defined as a mechanism of coordination between producers and consumers. The results of the calculations of concentration rate of milk and dairy products markets are presented; their spatial localization is also defined. The thesis of insufficient differentiation of unpasteurized milk market and excess differentiation of end milk products market has been formulated. The conclusion about the oligopsonic structure of the milk market has been verified. The barriers of entering and leaving the sectorial market, as well as vertical integration effect on the market efficiency, and market information asymmetry effects are considered. The authors’ interpretation of the typological factors of the milk and dairy products market segments is given in the paper. The presented results of the empirical research enabled to reveal peculiarities of the milk market and showed, firstly, the efficiency and degree of formation of the market coordination mechanism; secondly, a substantial deviation of its real structure from the ideal one. The mentioned deformations decrease its efficiency and necessitate the use of additional regulators.
